

THE ROAD

QUOTES ABOUT “THE ROAD”

It's the biblical story. The story of the triumph of love over evil, and we feel that it will give people a good feeling when they leave the theatre – that there is hope.

Paula Mae Schwartz, producer of “The Road”

As an audience member, I like to be moved; I like to go away thinking about things. My favorite films are the ones that stay with me. It's a tough film, there's no denying that. The world of the apocalypse we create isn't a fantasy, it's meant to remind us of events we've already witnessed. The book was a bit of a wakeup call and it was very timely. And that is the intent of the movie, that people will reflect on where we're heading and what is really important to hang on to.

I'm really hoping that people with overt, deeply religious perspective can find this material enriching and stimulating...people with a spiritual perspective are gauging and trying to understand and focus on the meaning of life and death, and good and evil, and all these things. To me this is a great story that conjures up all of those issues...I'm just hoping that deeper thought can come out of this material.

John Hillcoat, director of “The Road”

For every mother, every father who's ever had a child, for every son of a father, “The Road” will be a journey into the human spirit. It is a survivor's story in which the heroes carry the fire that is the life force that keeps hope alive, no matter what.

“The Road” Production notes

Throughout history, God has used modern means to illustrate an eternal message. All people and all things have been, and can be used as, vehicles for gospel distribution and reception, and “The Road” is not immune. “The Road,” intentionally or not, challenges humanity. Described as a “searing, post-apocalyptic novel,” it serves as a powerful parable that evaluates what the world would be like should humanity run unchecked. It also shows the persistent hope that still exists in unfathomable wreckage.

Phil Hotsenpiller, teaching pastor of Yorba Linda Friends Church and End Times expert

Christians should see “The Road” – to redirect those who fear that the best we have to hope for is the strength of human love. “The Road” provides Christians an opportunity to offer a better way to those seeking real hope.
